Avis, the jailor, I was allowed an interview with old Brown. I was received very kindly by him, and in a few minutes the subject of Slevery was introduced, upon which he spoke with the greatest pleasure. He thinks Virginians a generous people, but abhors the institution of Slavery. Says he made the blunder in holding the engine-house instead of the bridge. Says he could have fortified each end of the bridge with his small number of men, and would have given our troops a good deal of trouble before they would have surrendered. For this great blunder he says he ought to be hanged! I questioned him in regard to his opinion on the subject of amalgamation, when he responded, that although he was opposed to
